

Conversation Guide:
talking about money
and mental health

Myth busting

“You shouldn’t talk about your money problems.”

This is a myth. Many people with mental health and money difficulties find it helps to involve their family members, partners or carers in conversations about their financial problems. Reach out to friends, family, and professionals who you trust for support, and take one step at a time.

Myth busting

“Mental health problems aren't caused by money.”

This is a myth. Worrying about money can affect your mental health and living with a mental health condition can make managing money more difficult. This can lead to being in a 'vicious cycle'.

Myth busting

“Working more is the only way to increase your money.”

This is a myth. You may be able to claim benefits such as Personal Independence Payment (PIP), Universal Credit or Employment and Support Allowance – go to the Mental Health & Money Advice website to see our guides. Tracking spending and using a budget are also great ways to handle debt and increase savings. The smallest changes can amount to significant outcomes for your finances and mental health.

Myth busting

“I should stop doing enjoyable activities to save money.”

This is a myth. Looking after your wellbeing is extremely important. For good mental health, we need to be regularly taking part in routine and enjoyable activities. If you are unable to do these activities because of the cost, consider why you enjoyed the activity and look at other cheaper (or free) alternatives.

Warning signs and starting the conversation

Whether spotting signs in yourself or others, look out for:

- Being unable to afford the things you need to stay well (housing, food, heating or treatment).
- Avoiding certain places, bills, letters, people, or activities.
- Problems with sleep.
- Poor concentration.
- Feelings of guilt around spending.
- Spending to make yourself feel better.
- An addiction or dependency which makes you spend money.

Warning signs and starting the conversation

When having a conversation about mental health and money with someone else or when thinking about yourself, there are a few things you can do to help:

Avoid phrases like “you must” or “you should”, e.g. “I should be able to afford it”, rigid thinking can be unhelpful.

Question black and white thinking, and ask what evidence is there to support these thoughts?

Warning signs and starting the conversation

Boost self-confidence. When experiencing mental health and money problems, our confidence can get knocked. Remember, money problems are only one part of you, what are your unique qualities that you like about yourself?

Avoid catastrophising. Though money problems can feel overwhelming, consider how likely the worst-case scenario is.

Be practical and creative. What elements of your income and outgoings can be controlled, and what are outside your influence? Think about examples of when you've managed your money well, what did you do well and how could you implement that again?

Warning signs and starting the conversation

It can be daunting to be open about money and mental health problems, so if someone has chosen to speak to you, be empathetic. If you are experiencing mental health and money problems, show the same kindness to yourself.

With these tips, the idea is not to avoid the problem, but to rebalance the thoughts and give perspective so that someone feels able to reach out for further support.
